Because in English (British) the "correct" way to greet someone you've never met before is to say "How do you do", not "Pleased to meet you." The Daily Mirror has a pretty eloquent article on how to figure out if you're "Posh", and using the phrase "Pleased to meet you" is one of the key indicators that you're not. (Actually, I think reading the Daily Mirror automatically means you're not stylish, but that's just my opinion.) The terms âU' (upper class) and ânon-U' (not upper class) have been used to differentiate the way the upper class spoke from how the middle class spoke when it was trying to be âelegant. Wikipedia (not always a reliable source, I know), provides a list of U/non-U words and phrases. âPleasure to meet you' is part of the ânon-U' vocabulary, and it's not (presumably) something a higher class person would/should say. The Telegraph article dates back to 2010, and the author (Jessica Fellowes) spoke of her childhood. She was born in 1974 (see Wikipedia), and evidently the U/non-U division continued during her childhood. (She is the granddaughter of Lord Fellowes, author of Downton Abbey. It is reasonable to assume that her mother would have wanted her daughter to speak so as to show that she was a well-behaved girl.) This kind of label is old-fashioned nowadays, and can only be of great use if you're mixing with the upper class and trying to impersonate one of them (and in Britain, if you haven't studied the rules very carefully, it's likely to betray you in many different ways before being introduced to someone). In general, a polite conversation, it is absolutely good to say â Pleasure to meet you.
